

David Weber <weberdavid@gmail.com>

Tokio

Nadia Gem <kgemenetzi@gmail.com>

Mon, Nov 7, 2016 at 5:33 PM

To: David Weber <david.weber@aksamit.ch>

Hey David,

I'm not sure which railway it was that I mentioned-perhaps it was the Yamanote line? That's a circular train line that goes around Tokyo and stops at all the major city centres (including Shinjuku and Shibuya). Actually, one way to get to know the city highlights is to walk around this train line (that's the so-called 'Yamanote challenge'). It really takes many hours though-I tried it with some friends once and we gave up at Akihabara station. Even if you don't walk around it, if you stay in Tokyo you will probably end up using it a lot while sightseeing :) It's also a JR line, which means you can use the JR train pass for it, if you do get the pass.

I think in the first mail about Japan I also mentioned the monorail going to Odaiba, which is also worth checking out as it gives you awesome views of Tokyo (esp. if you sit at the front, which I highly recommend). Odaiba itself is also a fun place to see IMO, even though some people find it slightly cheesy. :)

Was it one of those that you meant?

Thanks a lot for your wishes and recommendations offer, I will definitely let you know if I need something :)

Best,

Nadia

[Quoted text hidden]